

EDUCATIONAL REPORT

Annual Report

1929

To the Director:

The resources of the department have been given equally, with rather close measurement, to instruction of adults and instruction of children. The attendance total, to be sure, shows a much larger figure for children; but 31,000 was the number for school children, largely paid for by several public school systems.

The adult work is yearly growing in the variety of courses offered. There have been eleven separate courses of class work given during the year, aside from public lectures on Friday evenings and Sunday afternoons. In three of the courses the classes have drawn in the galleries in connection with their lectures. The other courses have been in several fields of the history and appreciation of art. Classes from the School of Art, the University and the School of Education have continued their visits, and the staff has given courses and lectures for those institutions and for the Institute of Music, and the Y.W.C.A. One instructor has been added, Miss Charlotte Young, in place of Miss Underhill, who is transferring to the Department of Decorative Arts.

There have been two major developments of the children's work. First, a large increase of support from public schools. The Cleveland Public Schools have added Miss Carabelle Monfort as a third teacher at the Museum; and two suburban systems, Shaker Heights and Cleveland Heights, have contributed enough to pay a large proportion of the salary of a Museum teacher. Miss Pauline Kast has been added to the staff, charged chiefly with the organization of work with those two school systems. Miss Haest took the place of Miss Marguerite Bloomberg, who resigned in March to be married. Second, the decentralization of children's drawing through the establishment of art clubs in Branch Libraries has found support through a generous gift from Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Gleeson. The gift has made possible the retention of a teacher to carry on work with twelve of the clubs. Eleven more are led by students from The Cleveland School of Art, five of whom were a few years ago our own Museum children.

These teachers all meet with the assistant curator several times a year to compare drawings of their pupils and discuss the work.

Children's work can grow no further within the Museum building. Future development can consist only in improving the present work and controlling the outside growth in profitable directions. How far it ought to be allowed to grow is a new problem in museum administration.

A similar problem exists regarding the Museum lending collections. This extension department was started years ago as a sort of scattering of bait to catch the public of outlying districts. It has developed into a service to institutions, particularly schools and branch libraries, providing exhibition study collections of art unsuitable for the routine distribution of the large and efficient Educational Museum of the Cleveland Public Schools. The service reaches far out into the county, and it is yearly increasing in refinement of adaptation to needs and in quantity. During the year the number of loans increased fifty per cent. The work is done by Mrs. Ruggles on two-thirds time (theoretically, but actually much more,) with two assistants each on two days a week.

The collection now consists of about 3300 objects. Mrs. Ruggles spent three months during the summer in Europe purchasing material

Miss Underhill and Mr. Ramus who were studying in Europe in the summer, also made many purchases. The accessions for the year are as follows:
